Plastic in Snickers bar prompts Mars recall in 55 countries

FRANKFURT/LONDON/THE HAGUE

Mars Inc. has recalled chocolate bars and other products in 55 countries, mainly in Europe, due to choking risk after a piece of plastic was found in a Snickers bar in Germany.

All of the recalled products, which include Mars, Snickers and Milky Way bars, were manufactured at a Dutch factory in Veghel, a Mars spokeswoman said on Tuesday.

They were sold in European countries including Germany, France and Britain, and in certain countries in Asia. The recall does not extend to the company's home base in the US.

The recall, in effect since Monday, follows a Jan. 8 complaint from a consumer in Germany, she said, who found red plastic in a Snickers bar and sent it back to the company.

The plastic was traced back to Veghel which determined that it came from a protective cover used in the plant's manufacturing process.

"We cannot be sure that this plastic was only in that particular Snickers," a spokeswoman from Mars Netherlands said.

"We do not want any products on the market that may not meet our quality requirements, so we decided to take them all back."

It was not immediately clear how much the complex recall would cost the company, which is unlisted and therefore does not disclose detailed financial information.

The spokeswoman declined to comment on financial implications of the recall, which is the first to affect the factory.

Time delays between customer complaints and recalls are not uncommon since companies often receive notices, some fraudulent, about foreign objects in food, said Stephen Robb, a partner at Weightmans LLP in Leicester, who represents manufacturers and their insurers on product liability matters.

Consumer product recalls can result in heavy reputational and financial hits, as Nestlé learned last year when it recalled its Maggi noodles from India after a package was found to have unsafe levels of lead.

Cadbury's 2006 recall of more than 1 million chocolate bars after a salmonella outbreak cost that company roughly 20 million pounds.

Mars Netherlands said it was working closely with the Dutch food safety authority on the matter, according to a statement.

It added that the recall was an "isolated incident and strictly limited, and concerns only the products mentioned".
