

ing program was one of Anies' campaign promises during the 2017 gubernatorial election.

The apartment units are aimed at tenants who have an income of Rp 4 million (US$272) to Rp 7 million per month and married couples have priority.

Jakarta Housing Agency has reported that 2,482 people have signed up for the Samawa program, and the first 780 prospective tenants will be short listed after the agency verifies the documents submitted with relevant agencies, such as the population and civil registry agency, as well as tax agencies.

Dzikran said registration would reopen for the program sometime next month even though the number of applicants was already higher than the unit availability.

"We will open registration through a website where applicants can update their information anytime. We are preparing the mechanism to learn about the number of Jakartans who need housing. In that way the private sector can see how interesting his sector is," he said.

ve heat and cold temperatures at the houses," Farid said, adding that the material used for the insulator was a "secret".

Anies confirmed on Wednesday that he had seen the design.

"The design is great since it's not only artistic but also opens economic opportunity for its residents. We will discuss it in our DTR [revision] so we can decide how to realize it," Anies said.

Besides the RDTR revision, Anies also plans to disburse development funds, under the Community Action Plan, directly to people living in at least 21 kamungs to whom Anies has pledged political contracts. The plan, however, raises questions about the accountability of the fund.

Urbanist from Trisakti University Nirwono Joga said that despite the new design, Kampung Aquarium was still a green zone, and the Jakarta administration could not allow any development in the area.

"Whatever the form, it is illegal to build container houses or anything else in the [green] area. The administration must uphold the regulation and not support illegal development," Nirwono said.

Similarly, city councilor Pantas

Nainggolan questioned the administration's inconsistency with the spatial planning.

Anies, he said, should adhere to the spatial planning for development in the capital rather than accommodate his political interests. "Anies can't arbitrarily propose a revision for existing regulations," he said.

Wicaksono Sarosa of the Partnership of Sustainable Urban Development (Kemitraan-Habitat), however, said an issue more crucial than spatial planning was the budget, because container housing would require special material to cope with heat inside the houses.

"This is possible, theoretically, but we have to see how to deal with the heat because it is impossible to give them air conditioners. It can be solved but what is the material and how much will it cost?" Wicaksono said. (ggq)
